Based on 20 years of research, this is an insightful study of the split between the next generation of leadership within the Theosophical Society after the death of H.P. Blavatsky in 1891. Annie W. Besant and William Q. Judge began working together in the movement's Eastern School of Theosophy but over the next years their relationship became strained by a difference in approach as well as Annie Besant's accusations that Judge was forging letters from Blavatsky's adept teachers. This ground-breaking study seeks to provide a broad and comprehensive understanding of this time period in the organization and how the outcome shaped the culture of contemporary groups.
